renegotiated, has no provisions that spell out working hours. A change in traditional teachers' hours, the teachers insist, "can only serve to wreak havoc with our lives as we have built them."

In the end, the teachers feel, the 2,595 retarded residents of Willowbrook will suffer because performance in the classroom will suffer. "If I'm worrying all the time about my personal situation," Bienstock says, "how can I give my best in class?"

Explaining the reasons for the proposed changes, Cannon emphasizes that it is not just teachers who are being asked to change their programs; that all the changes might not happen and that other teachers in state facilities have been asked to make similar changes.

Cannon says the shifts might be necessary to expand the center's education program from days to evenings. Cannon says he wants to begin an adult education program at night and will need teachers. "We would try to get volunteers first," he says.

Cannon says that the state is attempting to make all employees work a 40-hour week. A teacher's day would consist of six hours in the classroom, one hour in the morning for consultations, and one hour after class for "professional time."

The professional time is usually off the center's grounds and, more often than not, it is leisure time off for the teachers. "It will no longer be a carte blanche hour off," Cannon says.

The teachers insist they are being treated differently than other teachers who work with mentally retarded persons. They say teachers in city schools make more money, work shorter days and have more preparation periods.

Teachers' salaries at Willowbrook range from about $9,600 to $14,700.

The teachers say they are not now considering a strike, but they are not hopeful that their union, the Civil Service Employees Association, will provide much help.

"Services to the residents will have to be downgraded," Bienstock says. "And already a number of teachers have begun to look around for other jobs."
