

Despite repeated messages left with their secretaries over a two-day period, Glenn Rickles, the attorney for UCP, and Robert Schonhorn, the agency's executive director, did not respond to requests for comment.

The ability to authorize elective surgery is an especially sensitive provision of guardianship. Often enfeebled by multiple physical handicaps, the population served by UCP faces an intensified risk of death caused by general anesthesia, experts say.

The death on the operating table in December 1979 of a patient institutionalized in the Karl D. Warner Center pointed up that hazard. The patient, Dotinell White, died under general anesthesia administered for dental surgery at Maimonides Hospital in Brooklyn, according to sources close to the institution.

Miss White's parents, Charles and Allean of Manhattan, reportedly were not asked to give permission for the surgery. They are suing UCP. Sources familiar with the case say Miss White's surgery was not urgent — in which case a guardian's or a judge's consent was required by law.

Rita Martin, a staff member of the Consumer Advisory Board, said that to her knowledge UCP had never sought court approval for the medical treatment of Warner Center patients.

Mrs. Martin monitors the care of Warner Center patients because the Consumer Advisory Board is specifically directed to do so under the Willowbrook Consent Decree.

By contrast with UCP, other agencies caring for patients whom Mrs. Martin monitors have gone to court to clear surgery, she said.

To avoid the need for a judge, Mrs. Martin, representing the Consumer Advisory Board, has been designated the legal guardian of patients without active families at the Flower-Fifth Avenue Hospital in Manhattan.

Members of the Consumer Advisory Board said they are disturbed by the stealth UCP used in filing for guardianship. They also doubt the diligence of the agency's search for parents.

Court papers show UCP checked parents' phone numbers and addresses but failed to check the Patient Resource Agency or the Department of Motor Vehicles.

And UCP ignored a state law requiring it to inform the Consumer Advisory Board and the Mental Health Information Service. Both organizations discovered the guardianship proceedings by chance.

In their court papers, UCP officials argue they were trying to make it easier to provide surgery for patients who have been "abandoned" by guardians.

Advocates of the mentally retarded concede the legal guidelines on surgery are inconvenient, but they insist the guidelines offer important protection to patients.

Under the guidelines, agencies must prove the need for risky medical treatment in state supreme court. This requirement may be bypassed only in a "life-saving emergency."

"If you sell a piece of somebody's real estate, you certainly have to go to court," Ronald M. Gottlieb, director of the Mental Health Information Service in Manhattan, said. "If somebody's life is at stake, you should at least give it the consideration that you give a piece of real property."

"It's interesting to see how physicians testify under oath, as opposed to in the ordinary course of a conversation," added David LeVine, an MHIS attorney in Albany who has represented mentally retarded patients in surgical hearings.

LeVine argued that "everyone has a right to be free from intrusion" without consent. "That's a right founded in the Constitution," he said. "Trying to guess what a patient would decide is difficult. That's why there are courts and judges."

MHIS is a state agency assigned to defend patients in state-funded institutions.

New York state's laws are being rewritten to facilitate bids for guardianship by private agencies, according to a spokesman for mental retardation commissioner James E. Introne. The new laws will be subject to the Legislature's approval.

Gottlieb, however, suggested that the revised law might meet resistance. Although he had not seen the court papers filed by UCP, he said that however well-intentioned, the agency seemed to be overreaching.

"I would think that anybody but (UCP) should have guardianship," he said.

Hansen recalled that the Civil Liberties Union lobbied for UCP to take over part of the state-run Staten Island Developmental Center in 1977, forming the Warner Center. The agency's care was considered better than the state's, he said.

Nonetheless, Hansen characterized the agency's quest for guardianship as "dangerous."
