Congressman Guy V. Molinari and John J. DePierro, executive director of St. Vincent's Medical Center, said yesterday that although all avenues have not been exhausted in attempts to keep the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital in Clifton open in some form, the facility's future remains uncertain.

Budget cuts have forced the closing of all eight public health hospitals by October but three localities, including Staten Island, are attempting last-ditch efforts.

Molinari and DePierro stressed that if federal funding to allow for a conversion process is not forthcoming by October, the plan to turn the hospital into a private voluntary operation may be doomed.

That assessment came at a meeting attended by political and hospital officials yesterday morning in Molinari's Ft. Wadsworth office.

In attendance were Borough President Gaeta, Deputy Borough President Ralph Lamberti, Assemblywoman Elizabeth A. Connelly, Councilman Nicholas LaPorte, Councilwoman Mary T. Codd, Aldo Benedetto, adviser to the council of the hospital, Joan Barnes of Councilman Anthony I. Giacobbe's office, Al Thompson, representing Assemblyman Robert A. Straniere, and Philip Straniere of Sen. John J. Marchi's office.

In August DePierro submitted to the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services a takeover plan proposing the formation of a new corporate entity involving the federal facility and the West Brighton hospital.

Under the 338-page proposal, the hospital would be operated under a new corporation with its own board of directors. But the facility ultimately would be responsible to the Sisters of Charity of New York, a private non-profit agency that oversees St. Vincent's and hospitals in Manhattan, Westchester and Yonkers.

The takeover bid is in jeopardy unless the federal government comes up with more financial assistance, including $24 million to upgrade the PHS facility to state standards. The proposal also involves $3 million to cover start-up expenses.

In its formal proposal, St. Vincent's estimated the cost of the conversion at $39 million and annual operating deficits over the next three years of $4.2 million, $4.9 million, and $5.7 million over the next three years.

With the October deadline ap
