

Training for disabled begins with celebration

By SHERRY BOSCHERT
ADVANCE STAFF WRITER

Staten Island's first training program to help the developmentally disabled enter sheltered workshops was celebrated at a reception yesterday in Willowbrook.

With about 80 workshop clients at work on either side of them, more than 70 people gathered in the Association for Children with Retarded Mental Development (ACRMD) building, part of the Elizabeth A. Connelly Resource Center in Willowbrook.

Down the hall, 14 clients in the new training program are learning the skills needed to move from the highly-structured classroom settings of day treatment programs to greater independence in the workshops. A behavioral specialist and a trainer's aide staff the program, which opened this month.

The non-profit ACRMD began three similar training programs at off-Island locations four years ago, said Paul Oddo, assistant executive director for the citywide agency.

"There was a great deal of apprehension" over the idea, he said. People wondered if including clients with a lower level of development in workshops would hurt quality control or the ability to meet deadlines for the contract work done, such as collating cards and cosmetics.

But with the goal of helping clients live more independent and satisfying lives, the idea was adopted. So far, said Oddo, 75 of 150 people served in the programs have successfully entered workshops, and two have gone on to competitive employment outside the agency.

Arthur Webb, commissioner of the state Office of Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities, congratulated the organization on its program, as did ACRMD President Milton Friedman.

The appreciative crowd was most pleased to hear from the keynote speaker, Assemblywoman Elizabeth Connelly, a 16-year veteran of that body and chairwoman of its Committee on Mental Health, Mental Retardation and Developmental Disabilities.

"Hollywood has their Elizabeth, and we have ours," said ACRMD Executive Director Ida Rappaport, to the delight of the audience.

Mrs. Connelly took note of the facility's location on the site of the former Staten Island Developmental Center, which succeeded the Willowbrook State School after news accounts exposed overcrowding and abusive conditions there in the 1970s.

"It's important that we're reminded of those days to appreciate how far we've come in the days of deinstitutionalization of the developmentally disabled," she said.

ADVANCE PHOTO/IRVING SILVERSTEIN

Admiring products made by workshop clients are, from the left, Arthur Y. Webb, Kalyan Patra, Ida Rappaport and clients Andrea and Elba.

The ACRMD refurbished the building, a former residential unit, to open its workshops there two years ago. Its clean, blue and white decor contrasts with an unused portion of the same building, where old furniture sits piled in a dingy green room.

Mrs. Connelly said the state's remaining 175 acres there, known as the Richmond Complex, are an appropriate site for the center because the grounds were intended to provide asylum — "a refuge," she said.

"The Richmond-Complex is proud to identify itself as Willowbrook," Mrs. Connelly said. "The spectre of the Willowbrook of yesterday will be the catalyst of good today, and a better tomorrow."